Benny The Rabbit's Brave Journey

Benny the rabbit wasn't the fastest or the strongest in his burrow, but he was the most curious.

While his brothers and sisters were happy
nibbling grass and playing in the same old spots, Benny always wondered what was beyond the big oak tree.

One morning, while the others were still stretching their ears awake,
Benny decided to find out for himself.

He wriggled through a gap in the bushes a nd found himself in a part of the meadow he'd never seen before.

The grass was taller here, and the air smelled different—fresh and earthy, with hints of flowers and something else he couldn't name.

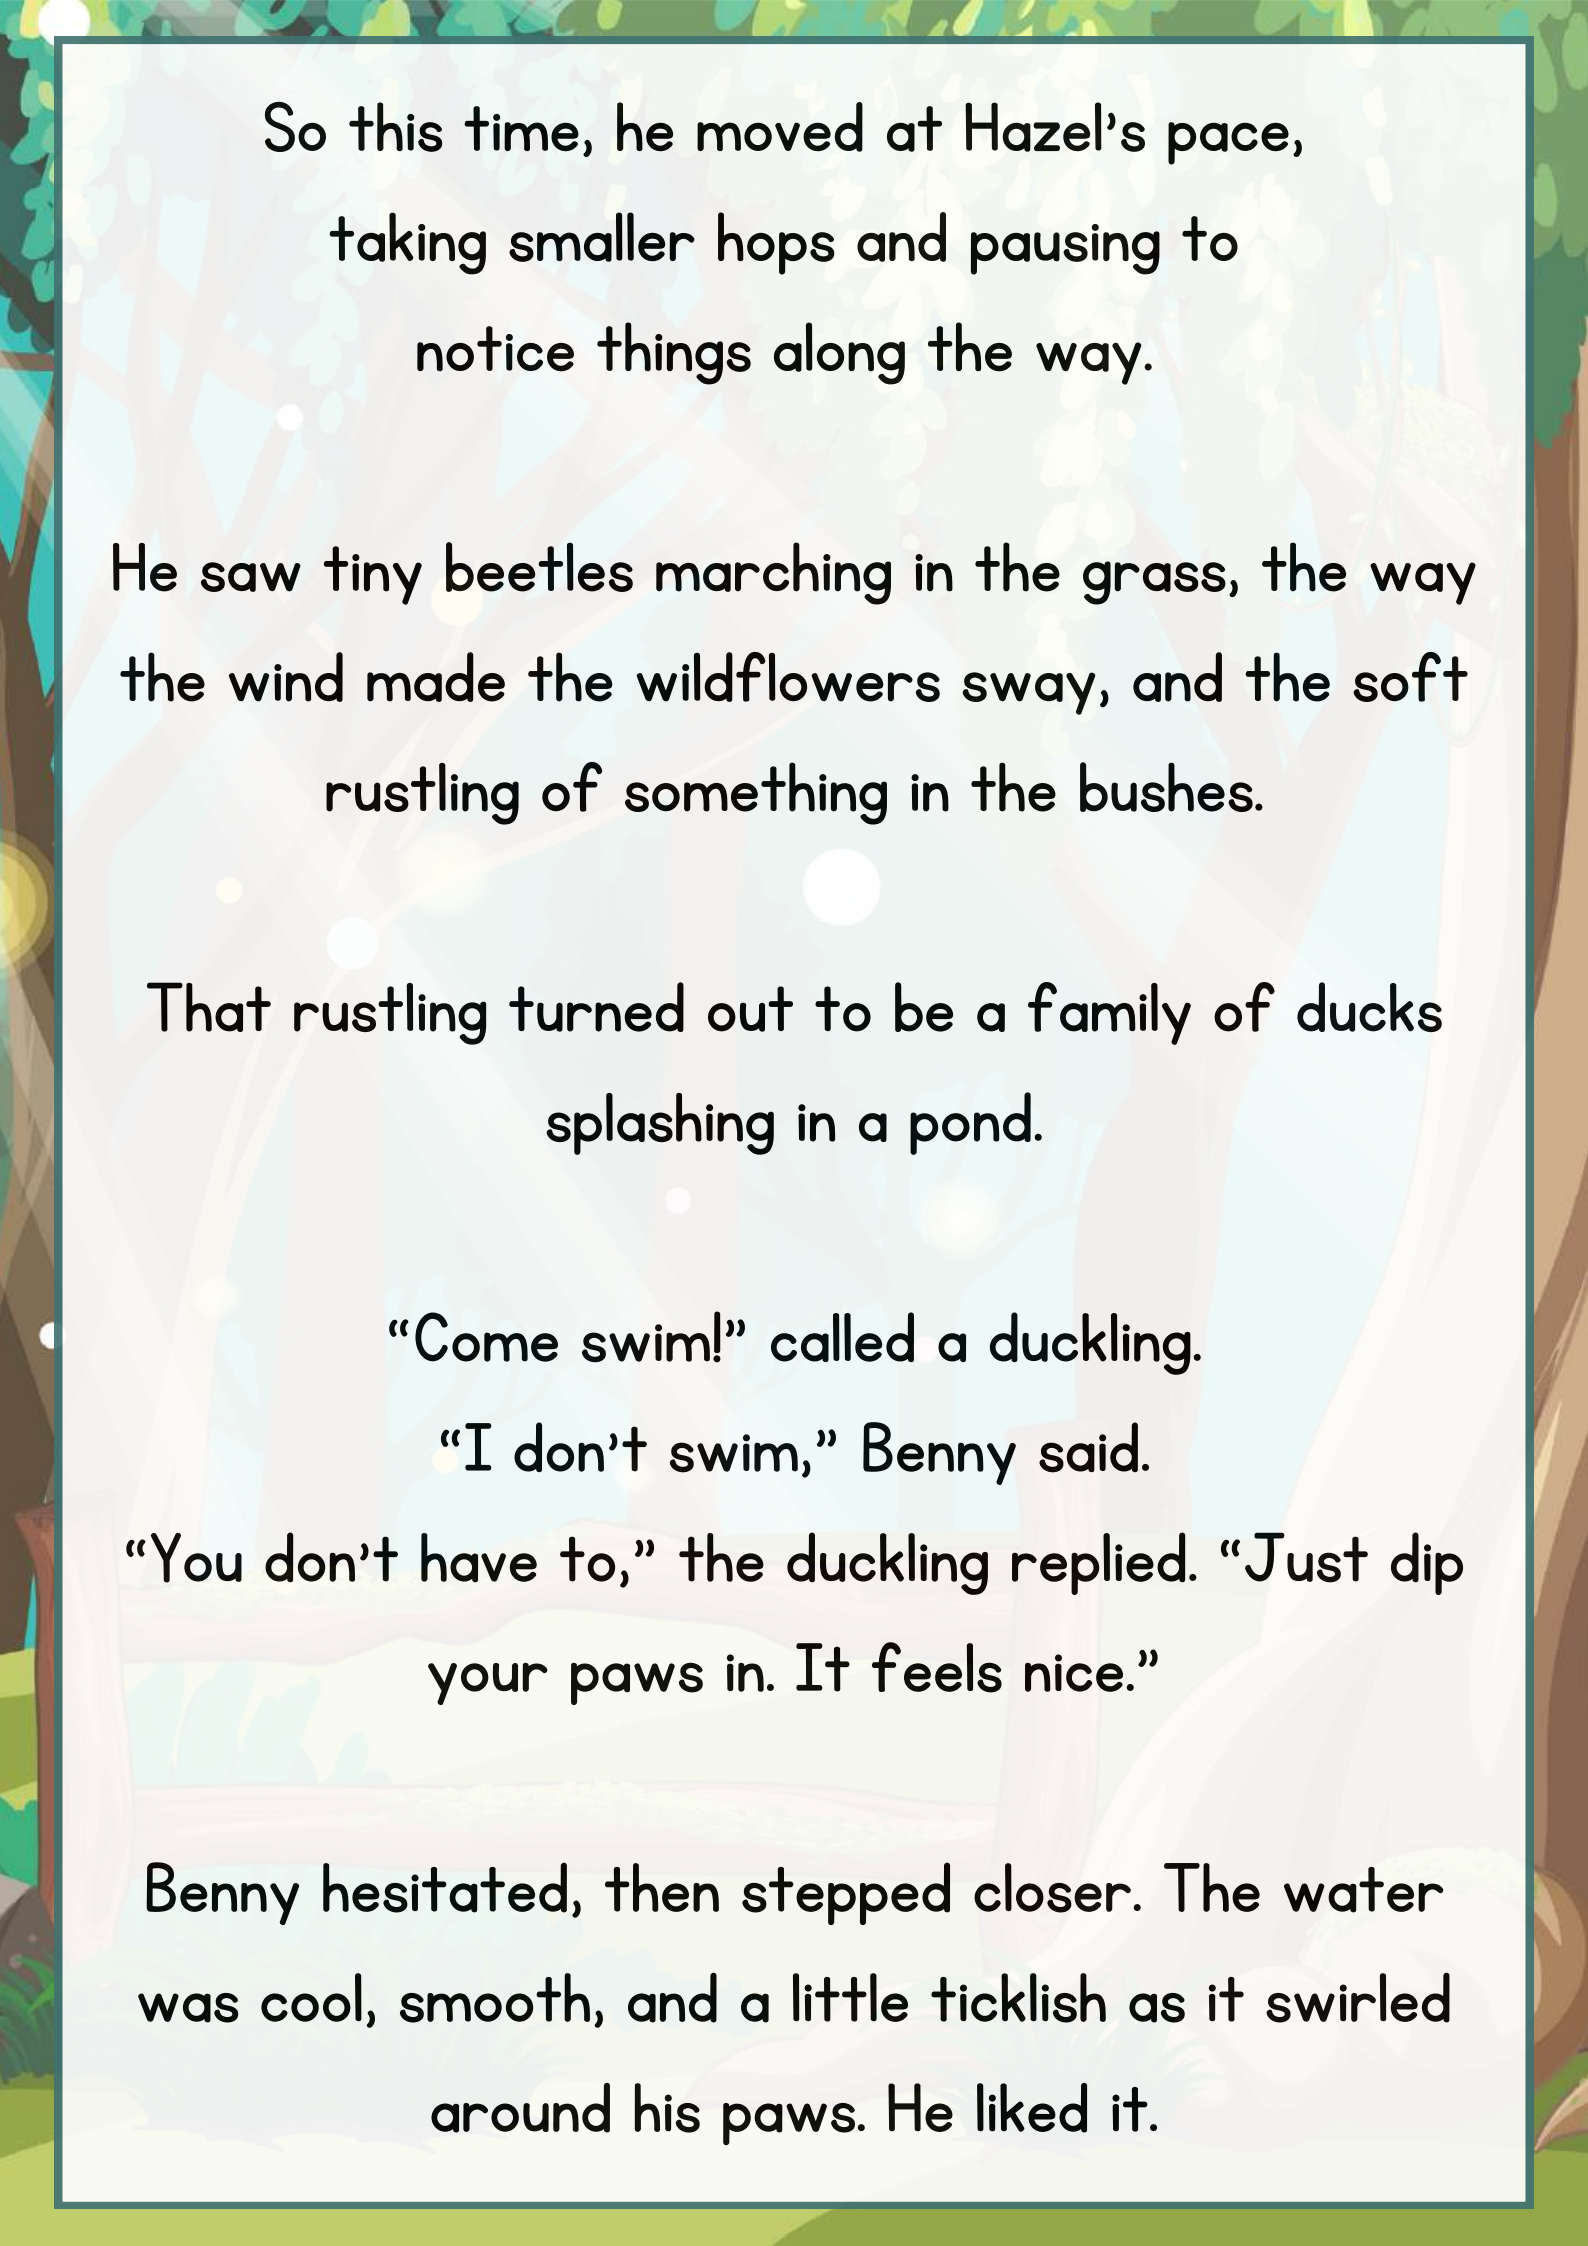

As Benny hopped along, he nearly bumped into a round, spiky shape curled up near a log.

"Watch your step, young rabbit," grumbled Hazel the hedgehog, uncurling slowly.

"Sorry! I didn't see you," Benny said. "I was too busy looking at everything else."

Hazel twitched his nose. "That happens when you move too fast. You miss things."

Benny had never thought about that before. Usually, he zipped from place to place without stopping to look around.

So this time, he moved at Hazel's pace,
taking smaller hops and pausing to notice things along the way.

He saw tiny beetles marching in the grass, the way
the wind made the wildflowers sway, and the soft rustling of something in the bushes.

That rustling turned out to be a family of ducks
splashing in a pond.

"Come swim!" called a duckling.

"I don't swim," Benny said.

"You don't have to," the duckling replied. "Just dip your paws in. It feels nice."

Benny hesitated, then stepped closer. The water was cool, smooth, and a little ticklish as it swirled around his paws. He liked it.

By the time Benny made his way home,
the sun was starting to set.

He hadn't gone very far, but he had seen, heard,
and felt so many new things.

He thought about what Hazel had said—maybe exploring wasn't just about how far you go, but about what you notice along the way.

That night, as he curled up in the burrow, Benny decided he'd go back tomorrow. Who knew what else was out there, waiting to be found?
